If you want to know the late Donald Hall, read his last book of essays: A CARNIVAL OF LOSSES: NOTES NEARING NINETY. Published less than a month after he passed away at nearly 90. This compilation of anecdotes is open, funny, and gives a true sense of a most thoughtful man who appears to have lived both a charmed and full life.

This is beloved poet Donald Hall's moving memoir A Carnival of Losses: Notes Nearing Ninety. Hall's late wife, Jane Kenyon, is one of my favorite contemporary poets, so I have a soft spot for Hall anyway, but when I read his essay "Between Solitude and Loneliness" in The New Yorker a couple of years ago I was brought to my knees.

Poet and writer Donald Hall died last June at the age of 89, making this collection of very short essays — many just a page or two in length — all the more relevant and haunting. I read A Carnival of Losses when I had a bad cold, and the aching in my bones seemed to echo Hall's descriptions of his many ailments and diminishing physical powers. Much as the sparse, spry prose of Donald Hall's last book, "A Carnival of Losses," delighted me at the beginning, it was his flippantly discussing "chasing girls" and his pithy quips about jumping on girls and kissing them that turned me off. This moment in history compels me to call out his dismissive objectification attitude of women.
