The first native peoples encountered by European settlers in the New World were Algonkian tribes, speaking variants of the Algonquin language group. While initially relatively friendly, relations between the Europeans and the Algonquin tribes deteriorated quickly.

The Algonkian Tribes [ushistory.org]

The mid-Atlantic groups that spoke Algonquian languages were among the most populous and best-organized indigenous nations in Northern America... Traditionally, Algonquin people shared many cultural traits with the tribes flanking them on the east, the Innu, and with the Ojibwa to the west. Before colonization by the French, Dutch, and English, the Algonquin were probably organized in bands of patrilineal extended families.
